Coast Guard Capt. Quentin Walsh, namesake of DDG 132 now taking shape on Shipway 1, wrote about his exploits in World War II where he referred to himself as a "BIGOT" – but not in the way that might jump to mind.

During the planning for D-Day, people who were authorized to have information classified above Top Secret were called BIGOTs which reportedly stood for "British Invasion of German Occupied Territory." Walsh was tasked with planning the reconnaissance and repair of deepwater ports on the European mainland for use in resupplying the invasion effort. In his "Memoirs of a 'BIGOT,'" Walsh wrote: "To be a 'BIGOT' I was subjected to a process called 'Positive Vetting', a deep and detailed security check by British and American intelligence on all personnel handling the key secrets of Neptune, code name for the Invasion of Normandy, the assault phase of Operation Overlord."
