“THE GRAPHIC” MAP OF THE DARDANELLES OPERATIONS

Karschall, the scene of the landing of British troops on August 7.

BATTERING AT THE GATE TO CONSTANTINOPLE: THE PROGRESS OF

The general position of the Dardanelles campaign is specially designed to illustrate the progress of the Allied naval and military operations in the Gallipoli Peninsula, and to enable the reader to follow the movements of the Allied fleet in their progress to Constantinople. Mr. Mansell's detailed illustrations very clearly show the progress of the Allied fleet in their progress to Constantinople. The map is a valuable aid to the study of the Dardanelles campaign, and is a valuable aid to the study of the Dardanelles campaign.

THE ALLIED NAVAL AND MILITARY FORCES AT THE DARDANELLES

from an attack from the Allies; and (2) the Allies, a hill 600 feet in height, dominating the sea of the peninsula. Gallipoli is an island about 10 miles long, and the Allies have made the most of their operations, the whole peninsula being covered with a network of trenches and small forts, well supplied with guns of all calibres and protected by elaborate arrangements. Here is being fought out what Mr. Churchill has well called "the last and fiercest struggle" and shortly but surely the heroic troops of France and Great Britain are overcoming all the obstacles with which both men and nature have beset the road to Constantinople.
